Remarkably, our society has devoted relatively little attention to mental health in the workplace, despite substantial evidence of a high incidence of psychological distress and dysfunction and a considerable impact on the lives of workers, their families and the community, as well as workplace productivity. The majority of Canadians spend a considerable proportion of their adult life working and our economy depends upon a competent, engaged and highly performing workforce. The recent considerable advances in the behavioural and social sciences must be brought to bear upon these challenges; work in the post-industrial age involves cognitive, interpersonal and emotional competencies. Advances in basic knowledge are complemented by a rapidly developing armamentarium of effective, evidence-based prevention, treatment and evaluation procedures. The need for action is reflected in recent and forthcoming legal and regulatory changes. Banff XLV will promote understanding of these issues and introduce practitioners, those engaged in policy development and other interested parties to solutions-oriented approaches to these challenges.
